Opus

The Opus collection exists in the vein of the great mid-century classics, a pared-back club chair that uses the bare minimum to create a personal sphere, a neat hybrid system of seats designed by Swedish design studio Form Us With Love in collaboration with Danish design brand +Halle.

‘We asked ourselves: “how do we create a personal space with the smallest means possible?” And we discovered that the challenges we faced were partly due to old proportions. Traditionally—if we are talking sound absorption, isolation, and phone booths—more is more. But in the case of Opus, we stepped away from that mindset, beginning at the other end of the spectra. Together we pinned up a semi-transparent mesh around a structure and then gradually added the least amount of material that the chairs could hold,’ says Martin Halle, Creative Director at +Halle.

‘Over the last three years, we tried and tested the limits of personal space with our design. The experiments were made with 1:1 prototype seats and blinds, aimed for as little interference with the environment as possible. By using a stool as a base, a metal rod and a felt band at the top, we were mimicking the blinkers on a horse. That was our starting point,’ says John Löfgren Creative Director at Form Us With Love and he continues: ‘it became an investigation of the minimum needed for full focus.’

The purpose of Opus was born out of the first Annual Briefing, a behavioural-led design forum held in Stockholm in 2018. In its infancy, the mesh and the blinders certainly felt like a radical take on the traditional category of dwelling. The main potential being softness and craft, in an airy structure. ‘Today, we see a lot of heavy seats trying to provide for privacy, with Opus we are using thin screens and bent steel, striving for lightness,’ Löfgren adds.

Spread across three seats, the series has two widths: a dining and an armchair, which comes with a high backrest. The idea of using lightweight metal frames to hold the seat and backrest gives you a sense of seclusion yet provides an open interior. We saw the need for a club chair that is easy to place, sturdy, hygienic, with a spacious silhouette and a dwelling quality,’ Löfgren explains.

‘We were wondering, why the category of self-seclusion has not seen a minimum version made yet? Instead, it seems the maximum has been heavily explored. When you start reducing, in the realm of sound-absorbing qualities the category becomes very interesting. I think the industry at large has been ambivalent towards the cry for personal space, which has resulted in thick and bulky solutions, with Opus we are challenging that status quo,’ says Halle.

The ambition is to create a space where you feel both secluded and part of your environment. ‘Throughout the Annual Briefing, we kept asking “how do we stay within the constraints of lightness?” Löfgren recalls. ‘The result is a collection that can be placed in many different rooms thanks to a slimmed frame. We strive for Opus to be transparent and multifunctional, solving challenges of co-habiting interaction and privacy in a dynamic space.’ Halle replies.

Visually the Opus collection is slender, does not overpower and creates a subtle harmony with its surrounding. ‘It’s about reducing material and creating a focus with the least possible. Opus is easy to move around, see-through and create an open interior with,’ Löfgren reflects. ‘The name, Opus, is work-related, but we wanted to give the series lounge qualities too. The experience, of sitting in Opus for a few hours, should not feel less, but sound, sturdy and rich, despite an airy construction, Halle concludes.
